

MASTERCLASS: TAXONOMIES OF PLEASURE

HEALTH MATTERS IN COLLABORATION
WITH FRIDA ROBLES AND MIRJAM WERTHER

Current times call for novel forms of engaging with one another and the world. In this workshop, we will explore forms of embodied knowledge practices that allow us to experiment with how to build the world otherwise. We will do this by tapping into idioms of joy and care as elements that help foster life, our own and that of others (human and more than human).

Frida Robles explores emotion and affect as key elements in knowledge production. She has engaged with issues regarding decoloniality, feminism and counter-history as expressed through art. PhD candidate at the University of Applied Arts Vienna.

Mirjam Werther values to experiment with arts-based techniques for meaning-making processes, especially in the context of collective knowledge production. As an anthropology student she is particularly interested in peace promoting ways of connecting and learning from lived realities.

Mafe Olarte-Sierra and Luci Mair are part of Health Matters, a research group at the Department of Social and Cultural Anthropology. We want to understand how health matters and how health is mattered, situated at the intersection of Medical Anthropology, Global / Public Health and Feminist Science and Technology Studies.
